

When you decide to sign a lease, try to meet your landlord face to face. If you manage to make a good impression on your landlord, they might be more willing to give you a break if you need a few extra days to pay your rent. Find out who the maintenance guy is so you know who to contact when your toilet doesn't flush. Even if you manage to convince the landlord that you are a wonderful person, remember that a good impression is easy to lose if you don't keep the apartment in good condition and take care of your rent on time. You are also liable for any damages that you cause to the apartment, so be aware of the fact that you also have responsibilities as a tenant and it's better to be safe than sorry.

Traveling is full of surprises, and overcoming challenges is part of the adventure. In Peru, hiking through the national park pushed me to my limits. The high altitude and steep trails forced me to manage my pace and supplies carefully. Every step was exhausting, but the view from the top of the mountain made it all worthwhile! I was breathless and tired, but completely exhilarated. Along the way, I met hikers from around the globe and kind locals who encouraged us, shared their supplies, and guided us through the most challenging sections of the park. Their kindness still stays with me today

Exploring the world has been a journey filled with challenges and unforgettable experiences. Every destination provides something unique, whether it's nature, food, history, or simply its people. Travel taught me to appreciate the little things and embrace the obstacles, but more than anything, it showed me that kindness, resilience, and curiosity are universal. We are all human in the end.
