I decided to stay in bed out of sheer convenience. The pandemic provided us with many new skillsets on how to cope with the changing world of work. Such notions as remote working and online ´ meetings became very familiar to all of us. It was a revolutionary change: people stoppe commuting and stayed at home full-time. The corporate world feared that productivity would collapse but it didn't. It was consumption that decreased. The economy didn't exactly thrive, but it adapted to changes very swiftly. The shift from working in an office to flexible working life was necessary. People weren't adequately prepared for that, and the separation of free time and work became an obvious problem, which was also addressed in many news articles and TV shows. Working from home was welcomed on a large scale. The revolution in the world of work that started out of necessity was more effective than any initiative has ever been.
